Abstract: Phragmites australis (Common Reed) is a dominant species in coastal wetlands and is a major component of the marsh plant community. It is a highly invasive species and has been identified as a major threat to the integrity of coastal wetlands. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of Phragmites australis on the growth and survival of Spartina patens (Cottontail Grass) in a coastal wetland. The study was conducted in a marsh in the coastal plain of Georgia. The results of the study showed that Phragmites australis had a significant negative effect on the growth and survival of Spartina patens. The growth of Spartina patens was significantly lower in the presence of Phragmites australis than in its absence. The survival of Spartina patens was also significantly lower in the presence of Phragmites australis than in its absence. The study suggests that Phragmites australis is a major threat to the integrity of coastal wetlands and that its removal is necessary to maintain the health of these ecosystems.
